Announcing the Osher Fellowship in Integrative Medicine

The Program in Integrative Medicine at the University of Arizona is pleased to announce that we are currently accepting applications for the Osher Fellowship in Integrative Medicine. This unique program is designed to train primary care clinicians and academicians to become academic leaders in the rapidly expanding field of Integrative Medicine. The two year program includes clinical, leadership, and research components, and features both distance learning and onsite training experiences.

Successful applicants will begin our distance learning Associate Fellowship with the January 2005 class, and will be in residence at the University of Arizona in Tucson for a 10-month sabbatical experience between September 2005 and June 2006. Applicants must be board certified in a primary care field of medicine, with demonstrated leadership in education or clinical care. Preference will be given to university-based or affiliated faculty members.

Andrew Weil, MD
Founder & Program Director
Program in Integrative Medicine
University of Arizona

The Program in Integrative Medicine, under the direction of Dr. Andrew Weil, began the clinical fellowship program in 1997, and is presently the largest Integrative Medicine training program in the country. Graduates of the fellowship are identified as leaders in the field, with most affiliated with academic medical centers. The university-based Integrative Medicine programs led by our graduates include Northwestern University, University of Wisconsin, Oregon Health Science University, University of Michigan, and Maine Medical Center.

Application deadline is September 1st, 2004.
