Introduction to conflict transformation

Tools for conflict analysis, resolution and transformation

by Ida Hydle (<http://home.hia.no/~idah/>)

Street violence, family violence and gross national violence as well as mass destruction as “conflicts” – a specific perspective: “Conflict as property” (Nils Christie 1977)

What is restorative justice:

A “healthy” perspective on conflict

Justice that heals: Slideshow - Justice that Heals

Ex. “Restorative justice is a systematic response to wrongdoing that emphasizes healing the wounds of victims, offenders and communities caused by criminal behaviour. In western cultures the offender is often alienated and the majority of the emphasis with regard to healing is focused on the “obvious” victim. Restorative Justice recognizes that there are more victims, including the community, and that the offender needs to take place in the process of restoring or healing his victims whenever possible, and restoring/reintroducing the offender back into the community...”

In 2004 Peace Officer Support continued to be an important part of the restorative justice process, teaching local peace officers and community members, restorative justice principles so that they could be applied when dealing with criminal or socially unacceptable behaviour in the community...”

Conflict transformation and mediation in the health sector

Exercises and role play:

You work as peace and health workers in a refugee camp at the outskirts of a gross violence area. The camp has 3.000 people living under extremely poor and difficult conditions. One night there is an outbreak of a quarrel with violent episodes between what at first seems to be two families with more than 20 members. The dispute seems to spread to other areas of the camp the following morning. Role play how you will organise your work and what happens.
